Some lessons need to be learned: You can tell your child a million times, "don't touch the stove, it's hot," or you can tell them once, let them touch it, and they quickly figure it out. Some will think I am evil, but the fact is it's effective. Choices are a part of life; the wrong ones will burn you.

Traditionally in America, we have always tried to make things a little better for our kids than we had for ourselves. It's the American way, but it is one that, in my opinion, sets us up for failure. The generation-to-generation increase in living standards (not just financial) makes it impossible for people to learn lessons that they need to survive.

Sticks and stones may break my bones, but words will never hurt me. Does anyone remember hearing that when you were a kid? It still holds true if you don't take feelings into account, but in today's hypersensitive society that is not the case, it's all about feelings.

Words that were perfectly acceptable a couple decades ago are demonized because some group's feelings got hurt. Just the other day I was made aware of a societal memo that I must have missed. The M word is NOT an acceptable
